

The life of the enemy alien in this country at present isn't as pleasant as it might be. Thousands of the species are being deprived of their liberty and sent to internment camps for the duration of the war. Here are some specimens gathered in by secret service men being taken by armed guards to a camp down South, where they can do no harm. International Film.

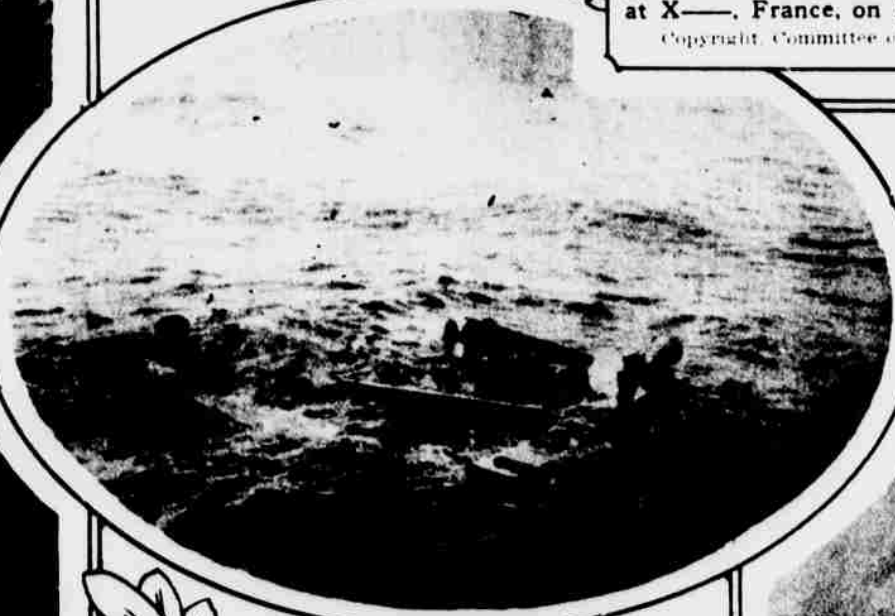

His Majesty King Victor Emmanuel III. of Italy (right) is popular in the extreme with his soldiers. He is shown here on the advanced lines. Photo from F. L. Swaab.

The great success achieved by the tanks has caused the Germans to attempt all sorts of devices to stop them. Here is one of the most interesting, a field gun mounted in a low steel turret. This innovation was located on a field captured by New Zealand troops. It had failed to do its work. British Official Photo. Copyright Underwood & Underwood.

A final inspection of the Liberty guns just before they went into action. Scene at X—, France, on December 11, 1917. Copyright, Committee on Public Information.

Rare photograph of survivors of submarine outrage just before they were rescued. They had floated for forty-eight hours in the manner shown. Copyright, Underwood & Underwood.

Vernon Castle's was a name to conjure with not so long ago on Broadway. And just the other day he died a soldier's death on a Texan aviation field, giving his life to avoid killing a cadet. The one time dancer was Captain in the British Royal Flying Corps, had seen real service in France and was acting as an instructor to American fliers when he fell to death. Photo from International Film Service.

King Albert and Queen Elizabeth of Belgium are what we would call in this country "real folks" despite their royalty. They are unconventional to a degree, and hence highly popular. They are shown here attending a recent review of the Belgian army. The Queen is talking with Gen. Gregoire of the French army and the King with Gen. Anthoine, commander of the French armies in Belgium.